Report: There Are 3,000 Child Soldiers in India

By Nilanjana Bhowmick / New Delhi

May 15, 2013

Add a Comment

Last year, suspected insurgents in northeast India’s Manipur state abducted three teenage boys. Despite a missing-persons complaint and a police search, they were never found. In Manipur, as well as several other Indian states, it is not uncommon for children to be kidnapped by insurgent groups to be turned into child soldiers. Indeed, around the same time as the boys went missing, five teenage girls laid down arms in front of police in the eastern Indian state of Orissa, a stronghold of Maoist rebels. They had been kidnapped from their village in 2008.

(MORE: India’s Northeast: How a Troubled Region May Be a Global Flash Point)

Stories like these have been circulating for years, but officials have largely chosen to ignore or downplay the problem. A new study may shake them out of silence: a report released last week by the New Delhi–based Asian Centre for Human Rights (ACHR) found that there are currently as many as 3,000 child soldiers in India. “The recruitment of child soldiers is rampant, and hundreds of children remain involved in the conflicts,” the report says.

The ACHR findings suggest that the problem is particularly severe in India’s long-running Maoist insurgency, but that children have also been recruited by insurgent groups in Jammu and Kashmir and parts of northeast India like Manipur, where separatist groups have clashed with Indian forces for decades. “In certain areas in eastern India, it is mandatory for families to give at least one of their children to Maoist rebels,” says Suhas Chakma, director of the ACHR.

(MORE: After the Death of Key Leader, What’s the Future for India’s Maoist Rebellion?)

And yet, the country seems loath to face, let alone address, the problem. A new study may shake them out of silence: a report released last week by the New Delhi–based Asian Centre for Human Rights (ACHR) found that there are currently as many as 3,000 child soldiers in India. “The recruitment of child soldiers is rampant, and hundreds of children remain involved in the conflicts,” the report says.

The ACHR report, submitted last Thursday to the U.N. Committee on the Rights of the Child, recommends government-sponsored rehabilitation schemes for these children and a need for greater awareness. It also asked the National Human Rights Commission to intervene to help address the issue. New Delhi can start by admitting there’s a problem.

(MORE: India Must Do More to Prevent Child Sex Abuse, Report Says)
WE RECOMMEND

- Pakistani Government to Ban Air Conditioners
- Osaka Mayor: Wartime Sex Slaves Were Necessary
- An Angry Obama. Finally.
- The New U.S. Way of War: Killing in the Shadows
- 3 Signs Your 'Amazing' Company Culture Actually Isn't

FROM AROUND THE WEB

- U.S. Citizenship as an Economic Asset
- Who's Buying Luxury Watches?
- See the pressures experienced by the Formula One teams
- Discover the Spirit of Japan
- "I am not accusing the media of any 'conspiracy'. It is just a matter of fact." — Your Middle East

Recommended by Outbrain [?]

0 Comments

Sign in

2 people listening

Newest | Oldest | Top Comments