EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Human Rights in China (HRIC) respectfully submits this report to the Committee Against Torture (“Committee”), in advance of the Committee’s review of the People’s Republic of China’s (“PRC”) fifth report on implementation of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (“CAT”).

HRIC also notes with appreciation the detailed and comprehensive List of Issues issued by the Committee in June 2015. Pending the release of an official translation of the State Party’s responses, HRIC has prepared an English translation to facilitate a constructive review and interactive exchange. (Please see Annex A).

Key Areas of Concern

China’s legal landscape has changed greatly since its last review by the Committee in 2008. The State Party Report identifies and discusses legislative and policy developments that are related to and impact effective measures to address torture. At the same time, however, the State Party has also introduced legislative reforms focusing on national security that may act to undermine existing procedural protections, especially highlighted by the ongoing crackdown on lawyers and the “incitement to subvert state power” charges brought against targeted lawyers. Taken together, these developments raise serious concerns regarding their impact on weakening structural and systemic safeguards against torture.

At a time when the State Party has made some legislative steps toward greater transparency, it is important to note that a trend in the State Party’s Fifth Periodic Report was its failure to provide, or its selective provision of, information in response to the Committee’s List of Issues of 15 June 2015.

HRIC’s Parallel Report focuses on three core structural challenges that still hamper effective implementation of the Convention by the State Party: independent monitoring, access to information, and access to justice. Specific issues related to these three core challenges are discussed below within the framework of each relevant article of the Convention and include:

- Independence of medical personnel and medical access to detainees (Article 2);
- Ongoing impact of the state secrets legal framework on access to information related to torture (Article 2);
- Limited scope of the Open Government Information Regulations (Article 2);
- Adequacy of data on complaints and investigations of torture and ill-treatment (Articles 12 & 13);
- Adequacy of compensation mechanisms (Article 14); and
- Application and impact of an exclusionary rule where torture is alleged (Article 15).

Recommendations for Additional Information and Clarifications Needed

Article 2

Independence of Medical Care for Detainees

Independence for medical professionals:

- The supervisory, remunerative, and contractual arrangements for doctors in detention centers.

- Whether guidelines are in place to ensure that medical personnel operate independently of prison administration and are not subject to interference or intimidation.
- Safeguards in place to ensure that medical personnel are able to examine victims out of the hearing and sight of police officers.
- Whether there have been any complaints by medical personnel and, if so, the outcomes of such complaints.

Reporting and investigation of torture:

- Safeguards in place to ensure that doctors can report signs of torture confidentially and without fear of reprisal.
- The process for investigating allegations of torture in detention raised by medical personnel, including whether the investigating body is independent with no relation to the authority that is investigating or prosecuting the case against the alleged victim; the number of such investigations during the reporting period; and the percentage of such investigations that found torture occurred.

Effectiveness of human rights and anti-torture training for prison and medical personnel in detention centers:

- How impact of the trainings described in the State Party's responses were measured and monitored post-training, including the indicators used to measure understanding of the international standards and guidelines, or change in attitudes or practices.

State Secrets System

- Number of detainees currently registered nationwide.
- Annual statistical data from 2008 onwards on the number of deaths in custody.
- Total number of allegations received, from all sources and methods, that a confession was extracted through torture and total number of investigations into such allegations.
- Number of cases involving state secrets annually during the review period, including number in which suspects challenged the classification of information, and number of such challenges that were successful
- If the requested information is still not provided, the Committee may wish to clarify why the information is unavailable and whether the information is still classified as a state secret.

Open Government Information Regulations

- Whether the following information related to monitoring torture is subject to disclosure under the OGI Regulations:
 - matters that occur following the commencement of formal police or procuratorial investigations (li'an);
 - internal criminal investigations into police officer conduct;
 - detentions that are "criminal in nature," including residential surveillance; and
 - close-circuit television records of conduct within offices at detention centers.
- The number of requests for such information have been received during the review period and in how many cases the requested information was disclosed.
- Examples of information requested but not disclosed during the review period and the reason(s) for non-disclosure.
- Whether measures or guidelines exist to ensure that the determination by public security and state security organs that their actions are pursuant to clear authority under the Criminal Procedure Law are indeed so authorized and appropriately excluded from the OGI Regulations.

Articles 1, 12 & 13

Data on Complaints and Investigation of Torture and Ill-treatment

- the total annual number of torture-related complaints received, from all sources and methods, for each of the crimes that the State Party has indicated cover the various aspects of the Convention's definition of torture, as well as
- the number of investigations, indictments, convictions, and punishments meted out for each crime as a result.

Article 14

State Compensation

Redress for psychological harm

- statistical data on the number and amounts of such awards for psychological harm related to torture; and
- specific information on awards limited by the cap.

Data on all compensation claims

- Number of applications made on the basis of all provisions in Articles 3 and 17 of the State Compensation Law during the reporting period.
- Number of these complaints that resulted in compensation and the average as well as aggregate amount of compensation awarded for these cases.
- Criteria or guidelines used by the procuratorate to determine which compensations cases need to be brought before the courts.
- Number of these applications that were heard by courts and the outcomes of such cases.

Article 15

Exclusionary Rule

Status and operation of the rule in courts

- Guidelines for determining the amount or type of evidence that would be sufficient to rule out torture;
- Guidelines specifically for the interpretation of Article 56's requirement that "[a]n application for exclusion of illegally collected evidence shall include relevant information or materials" (emphasis added);
- Statistics on the use of audio-visual records of proceedings in interrogation rooms; and
- Statistics on cases lodged against law enforcement or other officials as a result of audio-visual recordings and the outcomes of such cases.

Use of audio-visual records in interrogation

- Crimes considered "serious" under Chinese law, including the Criminal Procedure Law;
- Definition of "the interrogation process" or the "record of the interrogation" for the purposes of the Criminal Procedure Law; and
- Clarification of the phrase "case handling area" as described in the State Party's response.

Emphasis on external injuries in assessing medical evidence

- Measures or steps taken to ensure judicial training and follow-up to training sessions to facilitate understanding and identification of the various activities which constitute torture under the Convention; and
- Guidelines regarding the use of medical evidence in exclusion cases, including any guidelines for how health checks of persons exiting and entering detention should be conducted.

INTRODUCTION

1. Since its last review before the Committee against Torture (“the Committee”) in 2008, there have been significant domestic developments in the People’s Republic of China (“China” or “the State Party”) including a leadership transition in 2012, a destabilizing deterioration of the economic situation, and deepening restrictions and crackdowns on independent civil society.
2. Of particular significance to the upcoming review, the State Party has passed or amended legislation impacting the structures and systems that can enable or prevent torture; most notably its Criminal Procedure Law. These legislative efforts have yielded some formal improvements, such as the expanded use of videotaping during interrogations and a new rule excluding evidence obtained during torture. However, structural challenges within the State Party make it difficult to assess, monitor, and encourage the implementation of such improvements as well as their impact on preventing torture and other inhuman, cruel, or degrading treatment.
3. In addition, a suite of legislation¹ focused on national security and cutting against many existing procedural protections—combined with a continuing crackdown on rights defense lawyers—raises serious concerns that legal protections that help to prevent and combat torture in the State Party are weakening.
4. Three interrelated systemic challenges contribute to weakening both the Committee’s and Chinese citizens’ ability to ensure that preventative and remedial systems are working effectively, and that state actors engaging in or allowing torture are held accountable for their actions. Institutional actors (e.g., police, procuratorates, courts and lawyers) as well as detainees and citizens more broadly face:
 - limited ability to monitor detention facilities and the treatment of detainees;
 - limited access to information about the causes and scope of torture, as well as the implementation of protective measures; and
 - inadequate access to justice for victims of torture.
5. HRIC’s submission will examine reported improvements and discuss concerns raised by laws and policies as well as their implementation. Specific issues related to these three core challenges are discussed below within the framework of each relevant article of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (“the Convention”).

CONCERNS UNDER SPECIFIC ARTICLES OF THE CONVENTION

ARTICLE 2

Independent Medical Examinations

6. A fundamental component of adequately monitoring the treatment of detainees is ensuring independent medical access to identify, respond to, and help prevent instances of torture. In particular, access by independent doctors is necessary both to diagnose and treat the physical and psychological consequences of torture. In addition, independent medical access helps to establish a record that can be used to exclude wrongfully obtained evidence or as a basis for seeking justice against perpetrators of torture in the future (see further discussion of exclusionary rule in the section on Article 15).

¹ This includes the State Security Law of the People's Republic of China (2015); People's Republic of China Cybersecurity Law (Draft); Counter-Terrorism Law Of The People's Republic Of China (Draft); and People's Republic of China Foreign Non-Governmental Organizations Management Law (Second Reviewed Draft), all available at: <<http://www.hrichina.org/en/chinese-law-resources>> [accessed October 26, 2015] .

7. In recognition of the importance of the independence of medical experts and personnel, the Committee has repeatedly requested information on: (1) measures taken to ensure independent and confidential medical examinations of detainees and (2) safeguards to identify torture and prevent reprisals for reporting signs of torture (2008 Concluding Observations (“COB”),² 11; 2015 List of Issues³ (“LOI”), 3(c)).

8. In its response to the Committee’s questions, the State Party outlines a series of formal measures and implementation steps taken to improve medical care of detainees. However, several aspects of these measures raise concerns regarding independence of doctors and ethical conflicts including:

- An overarching role for the public security supervision departments under the 2014 Work Plan for Building the Professionalization of Medical Treatment and Health Care issued by the Ministry of Public and a national health department (“2014 Work Plan”) (2015 State Party response to the LOI⁴ (“State Party Response”), 3(3))
- A requirement that police officers (minjing) in detention centers verify the health examination form recorded by doctors during initial medical screenings. (Id.)
- A requirement that, where doctors discover possible signs of torture, they must report “to the supervisory department of the public security organ or the department of the people’s procuratorate that is stationed in the detention center.” Investigation of possible torture is then to be carried out by “the relevant departments.” (Id.)

9. The above structures and procedures outlined by the State Party raise serious ethical concerns for medical practitioners in detention facilities and do not conform with international norms and standards on medical independence.

International standards on medical independence and ethics

10. Chinese domestic regulations and standards applying to the medical profession do not appear to contain clear guidelines or provisions aimed at ensuring medical independence. In fact, the overlap of leadership of the Red Cross Society of China illustrates the blurring of the lines between independent medical experts and the Communist Party.⁵ However, there is a significant body of relevant international standards that provide a useful framework for assessing the State Party’s existing laws, policies, and practices. The standards are also referenced in World Medical Association (“WMA”) documents passed by the WMA General Assembly, of which the State Party (via the Chinese Medical Association) is a member. Moreover, the standards emanate from established multilateral bodies and represent a codification, refined and consolidated over time,⁶ of norms and best practices among the international community. While not binding, these international standards are also promoted in United Nations human rights training materials for prison officials and were specifically referenced as part of the focus of trainings for public security supervisory staff conducted by the Ministry of Public Security in April 2015.⁷ More generally, the State Party points to anti-torture trainings targeting prison/detention center medical and related personnel, as part of efforts to continuously strengthen “professional guidance in accordance with international standards” (State Party Response, 13(3)).⁸

⁴ Reply to List of Issues, U.N. Doc. CAT/C/CHN/Q/5/Add.2 (1 October 2015).

⁵ Senior members of the Red Cross Society of China continue to hold dual roles in the Communist Party of China and the Red Cross Society. For example, Honorary President, Li Yuanchao (李源潮), is also a member of the Politburo of the Communist Party of China, and the Executive Vice President, and former senior member of the Ministry of Health Xu Ke (徐科) is the Society’s current Communist Party Secretary.

11. These international standards were specifically developed to give physicians who provide medical care to detainees guidance on how to identify and respond to instances of torture. Two consistent principles emphasized are:

1. a doctor’s first duty is to the patient⁹ for the purpose of protecting and improving physical and mental health; and
2. full professional and moral independence in discharging that duty is of critical importance.¹⁰

12. When assessed against these standards, the measures described by the State Party are problematic because in the aggregate they create structures and procedures that result in a conflict of duties for medical practitioners in detention centers and open the way for informal pressures to suppress evidence of torture when it has occurred.

Formal structural arrangements create conflicting duties

13. Looking at the first principle—that a medical provider’s primary duty is to the patient—several elements of the State Party’s response and current practices raise concerns. Structurally, in at least one province, salaries of medical practitioners in detention centers appear to be paid through a process

⁶ See, for example, the WMA International Code of Medical Ethics which was initially adopted in 1949 and amended by subsequent World Medical Assemblies in 1968, 1983 and 2006.

⁷ Human Rights and Prisons: A Pocketbook of International Human Rights Standards for Prison Officials (UN; 2005), available at <<http://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Publications/training11Add3en.pdf>>. [accessed October 26, 2015].

⁸ The State Party notes that the Ministry of Public Security engaged the Guangzhou University Human Rights Institute to conduct human rights knowledge training classes for the public security supervision system nationwide, with a focus on training on various documents, including Human Rights and Prisons – A Pocket Book of International Human Rights Standards for Prison Officials, which explicitly references the UN Principles of Medical Ethics.

⁹ See, for example, Principle 5 of The Principles of Medical Ethics Relevant to the Role of Health Personnel, Particularly Physicians, in the Protection of Prisoners and Detainees Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, United Nations General Assembly resolution 37/194, A/RES/37/194 (18 December 1982) (UN Principles of Medical Ethics); Paragraph 5 of the WMA Declaration of Tokyo – Guidelines for Physicians Concerning Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment in Relation to Detention and Imprisonment, adopted by the 29th World Medical Assembly, 1975 (WMA Tokyo Guidelines); and WMA Declaration of Geneva adopted by 2nd General Assembly of the World Medical Association, September 1948.

¹⁰ See, for example, WMA International Code of Medical Ethics, adopted by 3rd General Assembly of the WMA, 1949, WMA Tokyo Guidelines.

coordinated by the public security organs.¹¹ In addition, public security organs and the procuratorate have legal and organizational authority over detainee health care, which suggests that those organs exercise supervision and control over medical personnel.¹² Together, the employment and supervisions of medical personnel by the public security and the procuratorate make it difficult for medical personnel to exercise independence first and foremost on behalf of the patients' health and wellbeing.

14. The procedures described by the State Party when injuries or signs of torture are discovered also illustrate potential barriers to the independence of medical personnel, including:

- The requirement that police officers sign off on the process of recording injuries discovered during initial medical screenings carried out by doctors in detention centers, creating a pressure point for interference with a medical practitioner's independent judgement.
- The requirement that doctors who discover signs of torture report it "to the supervisory department of the public security organ or the department of the people's procuratorate that is stationed in the detention center." This establishes a process layered with conflicts of interest under which (1) a doctor must, in serving his/her duty to act in the interest of detainees, make reports of torture to his/her employer that may be adverse to that body; and (2) for which the body may itself be responsible.
- Finally, investigation into allegations of torture is carried out by the "relevant departments." It is unclear which are the relevant departments, but this arrangement potentially conflicts with international standards that require that torture investigation and documentation be undertaken by an independent authority with no relation to that which is investigating or prosecuting the case against the alleged victim.¹³

15. These structural arrangements and procedures create formal duties owed by medical personnel to the prison administration, which have the potential to regularly conflict with duties under ethical codes to the detainee. The financial and supervisory structures additionally open the way for reprisals against medical personnel who report torture in the form of demotions, harassment, or financial penalization.

Risks of informal pressures compromising independence

16. Where health departments are operating alongside prison administration, culture and informal power relations also threaten medical independence. Working closely with prison management has the potential to create pressure on medical personnel to maintain working harmony. They further may feel pressure to respond to prison administration expectations and allow institutional interest to influence medical decisions and reporting. These institutional pressures create the risks of perpetuating existing bad practices and culture.

¹¹ This practice is evident in the following official article: Gansu Legal Daily, 《公安监管场所医疗卫生专业化建设工作实施方案》出台被监管人员将纳入社会医疗体系 “Local Work Plan for Building the Professionalization of Medical Treatment and Health Care in Places Supervised and Managed by Public Security” Launched: Persons Detained and Supervised To be Brought into Social Health System”, <<http://gsfzb.gansudaily.com.cn/system/2015/05/11/015515934.shtml>>, May 11, 2015 [accessed October 26, 2015].

¹² See, for example Art. 3. Detention Center Regulations (1990) 中华人民共和国看守所条例, which provide that detention centers are to manage the life and health of criminals.

¹³ See Report of the Special Rapporteur, Mr. Nigel S. Rodley, submitted pursuant to Commission on Human Rights resolution 1992/32, E/CN.4/1995/34, 12 January 1995, paragraph (g).

17. In addition to institutional pressures and power dynamics, the physical design and lay-out of prison facilities may impact the ability of medical personnel to conduct independent medical examinations. The Committee has specifically inquired whether medical examinations occur out of the sight and hearing of police/administration officers. (LOI, 3(c)) The State Party has provided no response regarding this important physical safeguard to ensure the professional and independent exercise of medical personnel.

18. In light of these concerns, HRIC urges the Committee in its interactive exchange with the State Party to request additional information and clarifications regarding:

Independence for medical professionals:

- The supervisory, remunerative, and contractual arrangements for doctors in detention centers.
- Whether guidelines are in place to ensure that medical personnel operate independently of prison administration and are not subject to interference or intimidation.
- Safeguards in place to ensure that medical personnel are able to examine victims out of the hearing and sight of police officers.
- Whether there have been any complaints by medical personnel and, if so, the outcomes of such complaints.

Reporting and investigation of torture:

- Safeguards in place to ensure that doctors can report signs of torture confidentially and without fear of reprisal.
- The process for investigating allegations of torture in detention raised by medical personnel, including whether the investigating body is independent with no relation to the authority which is investigating or prosecuting the case against the alleged victim; the number of such investigations during the reporting period; and the percentage of such investigations that found torture occurred.

Effectiveness of human rights and anti-torture training for prison and medical personnel in detention centers:

- How impact of the trainings described in the State Party's responses were measured and monitored post-trainings, including the indicators used to measure understanding of the international standards and guidelines, or change in attitudes or practices.

State Secrets System

19. In addition to independent medical personnel's ability to monitor the condition of detainees, access to information on related laws, policies, implementation measures, and actual cases is needed to understand the scope, causes of, and obstacles to effectively addressing the problem of torture.

20. Since its development in 1989, China's state secrets framework has presented one of the most significant challenges to accessing this information. This framework is comprised of a complex set of laws and provisions, including the Law of the People's Republic of China on Guarding State Secrets (revised 2010) ("State Secrets Law") and its implementing regulations and rules, as well as related provisions of the National Security Law of the People's Republic of China; the Criminal Law of the People's Republic of China, and the Criminal Procedure Law of the People's Republic of China ("Criminal Procedure Law") and associated interpretations.

21. Recognizing the significant barrier the state secrets framework poses to a full and constructive review of the State Party's implementation of the Convention, as well as the ability for Chinese citizens to seek information and monitor their government between reviews, the Committee has pressed the State Party to review this legislation in order to ensure that information and statistics relevant to assessing and promoting compliance with the Convention are available, including the number of potential torture cases that fall within the purview of the state secrets system. (COB, 15(A)).

22. Most recently, the Committee asked the State Party how the 2010 amendment to the State Secrets Law and subsequent implementing regulations affected the classification of information related to torture (LOI, 5). The Committee specifically sought to understand “the current situation with regard to the availability of information, including statistics on detainees in all forms of detention and on unnatural deaths in detention.” (LOI, 5)

23. In response to these questions, the State Party stated that “[i]nformation regarding torture does not fall within the scope of state secrets prescribed by the Law on Guarding State Secrets.” (State Party Response, 5) Despite this assurance, the State party has still not provided a substantial amount of the information requested by the Committee, including information that was previously classified as a state secret under the 1989 State Secrets legal framework. The below chart maps illustrative examples :

Information requested by the Committee in List of issues	Related secrecy classification under the 1989 State Secrets legal framework
Number of detainees currently registered [nationwide] (LOI, 3(b))	Secret - Compiled annual and quarterly statistics on prisoners currently in detention nationwide ¹⁴
Annual statistical data from 2008 onwards on the number of deaths in custody ... (LOI, 15)	Highly Secret – Statistics nationwide... on unusual deaths in prisons , juvenile detention facilities, and reeducation through labor facilities. ¹⁵
Number of cases in which detainees have alleged that their confessions were extracted through torture (LOI, 32)	Highly Secret – Statistics and specific case details regarding the use of torture to extract confessions and corporal punishment abuse that led to serious consequences. ¹⁶

24. In each of these cases, despite the assertion that information relating to torture does not fall within the scope of state secrets, the information requested by the Committee has not been provided.

- The State Party provided no information regarding the total number of detainees currently registered nationwide, despite stating that “[a]t present, all detention centers have established a registration system” (State Party Response, 3(2)), which would suggest that such information is readily available.
- Similarly, though the State Party’s response states that according to “a series of regulations issued separately or together by the Supreme People’s Procuratorate, Ministry of Public Security, and Ministry of Civil Affairs since 2010, procuratorial organs shall conduct an independent and impartial investigation into all deaths in custody...,” no statistics are provided on annual unusual deaths in prisons nationwide.

- Finally, while the State Party does provide some statistical information on complaints and convictions for the use of torture to extract confessions, it does not provide the total number of complaints received via all channels and sources, nor the total number of such cases investigated by the procuratorate, both critical pieces of information for evaluating the overall scope of the problem and the efficacy of the existing oversight and accountability processes.

25. In light of the State Party's statement that information related to torture does not fall within the scope of state secrets, the Committee may wish to reiterate its request for the following information:

- Number of detainees currently registered nationwide.
- Annual statistical data from 2008 onwards on the number of deaths in custody.
- Total number of allegations received, from all sources and methods, that a confession was extracted through torture and total number of investigations into such allegations.
- Number of cases involving state secrets annually during the review period, including number in which suspects challenged the classification of information, and number of such challenges that were successful

26. If the requested information is still not provided, the Committee may wish to clarify why the information is unavailable and whether the information is still classified as a state secret.

Open Government Information Regulations

27. In response to the Committee's concerns regarding restrictions placed on the availability of information related to torture by the state secrets framework, the State Party highlighted the Regulations of the People's Republic of China on Open Government Information ("OGI Regulations") as a practical measure to ensure citizens' right to know. (State Party Response, 5) In describing these regulations, the State Party stated "citizens, legal persons or other organizations who believe that their lawful rights and interests have been infringed in the course of specific administrative actions by an administrative organ in carrying out its open government information work, may according to law apply for administrative review or may commence administrative litigation." (Id.)

28. The passage of the OGI Regulations, which came into effect in May 2008, was an important step in enhancing transparency in the State Party. As the State Party describes, the OGI Regulations enable citizens to make requests for government information and require relevant bodies to indicate whether or not the information will be provided within 30 days.¹⁷ However, the scope of and exceptions to these regulations significantly limit their usefulness in practice to obtaining torture related information.

State Secrets Exception

¹⁷ Regulations of the People's Republic of China on Open Government Information. Adopted by the State Council on April 5, 2007; Effective May 1, 2008 (hereinafter "OGI Regulations"). Available in English at: <http://www.law.yale.edu/documents/pdf/Intellectual_Life/Ch_OGI_Regualtions_Eng_Final_051607.pdf> [accessed October 26, 2015] (Translation by China Law Center, Yale Law School).

29. The first limitation of the OGI Regulations in the context of torture is that state secrets are explicitly excluded by Article 14, which reads in relevant part:

“Administrative organs should establish and perfect mechanisms to examine for secrecy the government information to be released, and clarify the examination procedures and responsibilities.

Prior to disclosing government information, administrative organs should examine the government information to be disclosed in accordance with the provisions of the Law of the People's Republic of China on Safeguarding State Secrets and other laws, regulations and relevant state provisions...

Administrative organs may not disclose government information that involves state secrets....”

(Emphasis added by HRIC)¹⁸

30. Given the broad and vague nature of the State Secrets Law and the opacity of state secrets classifications, this exception is vulnerable to misuse and has the potential to sweep a vast amount of information outside the purview of the OGI Regulations.

Limited Administrative Scope

31. Even absent state secrets limitations, a substantial amount of information related to torture is not subject to disclosure under OGI Regulations because, as indicated by the State Party in its response, the scope of OGI Regulations is limited to information about administrative actions carried out by administrative organs (State Party Response, 5, emphasis added).

32. This is particularly limiting for torture-related information because torture often occurs in the course of criminal investigations and a substantial portion of the investigation process is not considered “administrative in nature” under the laws of the State Party. For instance, information related to the following issues would not fall within the scope of the Regulations because under Chinese law it would be considered criminal rather than administrative in nature:

- Matters that occur following the commencement of formal police or procuratorial investigations (li'an).¹⁹
- Internal criminal investigations into police officer conduct.²⁰

¹⁸ Id., see Art. 14.

¹⁹ This refers to the period from which the Procuratorate or the public security organs open a formal investigation into a crime. For in-depth discussion of this term, see, Kui Sin, King, Wagner, Anne and Cheng, Le, The Ashgate Handbook of Legal Translation (2014, Ashgate), 259-60.

<https://books.google.com/books?id=jxGdBOAAQBAJ&printsec=frontcover&source=gbs_atb#v=onepage&q&f=false> [accessed October 26, 2015]. 白文平诉漯河市公安局郾城区分局信息公开案, Bai Wenping v Luohe City, Yancheng District Public Security Bureau, An Open Government Information Case (Plaintiff sought disclosure of reports and other information relating to deceased husband's cause of death), and 郑敏杰与厦门市公安局思明分局二审判决书 (2015) Zheng Minjie v. Xiamen City Public Security Bureau Si Ming Sub-Division, Second Instance Ruling (2015).

- Detentions which are “criminal in nature,” as defined by the Criminal Procedure Law, including residential surveillance.²¹

33. A further means by which information may be excluded is where it falls outside the “official duties” of those administrative organs. In one case, in which close-circuit television records of public security offices at a detention center were sought, the information request was denied on the basis that it was not within the ‘official duties’ of public security officers.²²

Limited Ability to Seek Court Review of Denied OGI Requests

34. The limited scope of information subject to disclosure under the OGI Regulations is exacerbated by a Supreme People’s Court interpretation limiting court review in cases involving actions arising from the Criminal Procedure Law.²³ Under the OGI Regulations, the government body to which a request for information is submitted is tasked with determining whether that information falls within or outside the scope of the OGI Regulations.²⁴ If the individual requesting the information is not satisfied with the determination in his/her case, s/he is entitled to seek review of the determination by a court. However, a review of publicly available court decisions reveals that courts are denying such lawsuits citing the Supreme People’s Court’s interpretation of the Administrative Litigation Law of the People Republic of China.²⁵

35. The interpretation states that administrative lawsuits regarding actions by public security and state security organs that are clearly within their authority under the Criminal Procedure Law cannot be reviewed by a court. This limitation potentially adds an additional barrier to accessing information about actions by public security and state security organs by insulating decisions about related information requests from court review

36. Though the State Party has emphasized its efforts to create a system of public supervision in which “case handling rules, regulations and procedures” are made public (2009 Follow-up Report of the State Party (“Follow-up Report”),²⁶ 1(e)), it is unclear whether requests for such procedures and guidelines would be excluded from court review under the interpretation.²⁷ Courts have already denied cases for similar information, such as police handling of emergency calls,²⁸ or expert reports.²⁹

37. To better understand and assess the applicability and impact of the OGI Regulations on addressing the problem of torture, HRIC urges the Committee to request additional information and clarifications on the following:

- Whether the following information relevant to monitoring torture is subject to disclosure under the OGI Regulations:
 - matters that occur following the commencement of formal police or procuratorial investigations (li'an);
 - internal criminal investigations into police officer conduct;
 - detentions which are “criminal in nature,” including residential surveillance; and

ARTICLES 1, 12 and 13

Data on Complaints and Investigation of Torture and Ill-treatment

38. In addition to independent access to detainees, and access to information about laws, policies and measures relevant to torture, access to justice when violations occur is a critical component of addressing the problem of torture. The ability to effectively hold perpetrators accountable is fundamental both to addressing impunity for past instances of torture and to creating the disincentives necessary to prevent torture in the future. Statistical data on the number of complaints, investigations, indictments, convictions and punishments in cases related to torture are of paramount importance to assessing whether sufficient access to justice exists.

39. In response to questions and concerns raised by the Committee, including the lack of a definition of torture that is compatible with Article 1 of the Convention, the State Party asserts that, though it lacks a single definition of torture, torture is effectively punished by a suite of crimes. The crimes listed are:

- unlawful detention,
- extracting a confession under torture by justice system personnel,
- obtaining evidence by violence,
- abuse of prisoners by prison personnel or other persons at the direction of prison personnel,
- intentional infliction of bodily harm,
- humiliation,
- unlawful searches,
- unlawful entry into residences,
- unlawful deprivation of citizens' freedom of religious belief,
- infringement upon the customs of minorities. (State Party Response, 1)

40. However, in response to the Committee's repeated requests for data on the number, handling and outcome of complaints and investigations into torture (COB, 17; LOI, 22), the State Party has consistently provided information on the indictments and convictions for only three crimes: "torture and corporeal punishment to extort confession," "violence in collecting evidence," and "maltreatment of detainees." (Fifth Periodic Report of the State Party³⁰ ("Periodic Report"), 74; State Party Response, 22) By the State Party's own account of the crimes which punish actions amounting to torture, these three crimes fall far short of the complete data necessary to assess whether the full range of cases involving torture are punished in practice and whether this record of enforcement is in compliance with the Convention's definition of torture.

41. In addition, the State Party only provides information on complaints received via a special online hotline set up by the procuratorate. While this is an important resource and source of information, there are many other avenues through which victims of torture may raise a torture-related issue or in which instances of torture may be identified, including most notably:

- where a criminal suspect requests exclusion of evidence on the grounds of torture;

³⁰ Fifth periodic report due in 2012, China, U.N. Doc. CAT/C/CHN/5 (20 June 2013).

- through the State Party's petitioning system;³¹ and
- through reports by doctors following medical examinations of detainees.

42. To better understand whether victims of torture are able to regularly obtain access to justice, HRIC urges the Committee to request information and clarifications regarding:

- the total annual number of torture-related complaints received, from all sources and methods, for each of the crimes that the State Party has indicated cover the various aspects of the Convention's definition of torture, as well as
- the number of investigations, indictments, convictions and punishments meted out for each crime as a result.

ARTICLE 14

43. In addition to the ability to successfully bring a complaint of torture to court, the ability to seek and obtain adequate remedy when torture has occurred is central to ensuring full access to justice for victims. The Committee's List of Issues requested information regarding (1) the scope of state compensation in the State Party, specifically whether it covers material and moral damages, and (2) statistical data on compensation for all categories of torture-related harm that were granted during the review period. (LOI, 29 and 30 respectively)

Scope of Compensation: redress for psychological harm

44. Since January 1995, the Supreme People's Court has published standards for determining compensation amounts in cases of deprivation of personal liberty, providing a fixed rate for each day in which liberty was deprived.³² Currently, these standards stipulate a daily rate of 219.72 yuan per/day.³³ However, there was a lack of clarity and guidelines regarding compensation for psychological harm.

45. Since its last review, and in line with the Committee's recommendation that it ensure adequate redress for victims including for psychological harms (2008 COB, 30), the State Party has expanded the scope of the Law of the People's Republic of China on State Compensation (1994, Amended 2013) ("State Compensation Law") to expressly include awards for psychological harm. (Periodic Report, 84; State Party Response, 29(2)). The new provision, Article 35, states:

³¹ China's petitioning system is an administrative system in which individuals may submit suggestions, complaints, and grievances related to official action or inaction. Petitioning is also a means by which higher level governments may be made aware of abuses by lower-level government officials, including torture. See, "'We Could Disappear At Any Time': Retaliation and Abuse Against Chinese Petitioners' (December 2005), Human Rights Watch. < <https://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/reports/china1205wcover.pdf> > [accessed October 26, 2015].

³² See, e.g. 国家赔偿标准提升 侵犯人身自由日赔近 220 元, 'State Compensation Standard is raised: Violations of personal freedom compensated at almost 220 yuan per day' (People's Daily, May 28, 2015), <<http://politics.people.com.cn/n/2015/0528/c1001-27069093.html>> [accessed October 26, 2015]; see State Compensation Law, at <http://www.spp.gov.cn/sscx/201404/t20140424_71280.shtml> [accessed October 26, 2015].

“Psychological harm in persons caused by acts violating the stipulations of Art. 3 or Art. 17 should be compensated for, within the extent of the effects of the violation, by means of eliminating the impact on the victims, restoring their reputation, a formal apology; where the consequences [of the violation] are serious, consolation money corresponding to the psychological harm should [also] be paid [to the victims].”³⁴

46. This legislative amendment in 2010 was a positive step towards responding to Committee concerns that arose in the State Party’s last review regarding the inadequacy of psychological care and compensation for victims of torture. However, subsequent guidelines for psychological harm awards issued by the Supreme People’s Court raise concerns regarding the implementation of this provision for compensation for psychological harm.

47. In 2014, the Supreme People’s Court further issued an interpretation on compensation for psychological harm, emphasizing that psychological harm was now compensable under the law and should be awarded when appropriate, either through formal acts, such as apologies or retractions, or by way of monetary payment.³⁵ However, the interpretation also set a cap on the amount of psychological compensation, stating that it should not exceed 35 percent of the sum of compensation for deprivation of liberty, life, and health.³⁶ This approach has been echoed, in some cases providing an even more restrictive cap, by guiding cases and provincial standards as well.³⁷

48. The impact of these guidelines may be inadequate redress for the psychological harm suffered by victims of torture. This is especially likely given the State Party’s inclusion of reputational harm, which often results in demonstrable financial losses, within the definition of psychological harm. For example, in one case of unlawful imprisonment, recovery fell far short of the calculated losses for, among other things, reputational damage due to an imposed cap of 35 percent.³⁸

49. To understand the impact of these guidelines and the imposed 35 percent cap on the amount of psychological compensation, the Committee may wish to repeat its request for:

- Statistical data on the number and amounts of awards for psychological harm related to torture; and
- Specific information on awards limited by the cap.

Inadequate data provided to understand compensation in torture cases

50. As with the information regarding complaints and investigations of torture, the information provided by the State Party regarding state compensation cases related to torture is incomplete and inadequate to assess whether victims of torture have proper redress and access to justice.

51. In its List of Issues, the Committee asked the State Party to provide “the number of applications lodged for State compensation for torture and abuse in places of detention,” as well as the “range of awards for successful cases (LOI, 30).

52. In its reply, the State Party stated that there were 12 cases “accepted by courts in which criminal compensation was sought for death or injury resulting from torture” (State Party Response, 30). However, this figure is limited in two significant ways. First, it relates only to the number of cases accepted by courts and fails to address the overall number of applications lodged for state compensation for torture as requested by the Committee. Second, it covers only one of ten compensable categories of official action relevant to torture, cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment. The remaining categories, described in Articles 3 and 17 of the State Compensation Law, relate to both administrative and criminal functions, and cover issues constituting torture such as unlawful detention, unlawfully using weapons or police restraint implements, and causing bodily injury or death by battery or maltreatment. An English translation of the full text of Articles 3 and 17 is provided in Annex B.

53. To understand and evaluate the scope, adequacy, and effectiveness of redress afforded through compensation claims and awards, the Committee may wish to request additional information and clarifications regarding:

- Number of applications made on the basis of all provisions in Articles 3 and 17 of the State Compensation Law during the reporting period.
- Number of these complaints that resulted in compensation and the average as well as aggregate amount of compensation awarded for these cases.
- Criteria or guidelines used by the procuratorate to determine which compensations cases need to be brought before the courts.

Exclusion of Evidence and Confessions Extracted through Torture (“the Exclusionary Rule”)

54. In addition to providing compensation to the victims of torture, another important penalty that helps ensure access to justice is the exclusionary rule. In its 2008 Concluding Observations (COB, 11(d)), the Committee requested that the State Party enact such a rule. The State Party has made progress in this respect introducing a form of the exclusionary rule in 2010.³⁹ As its 2014 report further indicates (Periodic Report, 16), the State Party conducted significant legislative revisions in 2012 which codified the exclusionary rule into Articles 54-58 of the Criminal Procedure Law.⁴⁰

55. To better understand the implementation of this new rule, the Committee further asked the State Party to identify steps taken to ensure that in practice (LOI, 31):

- Criminal convictions are based on evidence other than the confession of the detainee; and
- Procurators and judges are not unjustifiably refusing requests to exclude illegally obtained evidence.

56. The Committee also asked for information regarding specific cases, disaggregated statistical data and legal or other guidelines on audio-visual recording and use of medical personnel in respect of the above aims (LOI, 31-33).

57. In its response, the State Party did not provide the majority of the requested information, providing instead a list of five “representative” cases, all of which resulted in the exclusion of evidence (State Party Response, 31). HRIC has compared these cases to a random sample of other publicly available cases involving the exclusionary rule.⁴¹ Our analysis raises concerns that, when viewed in a broader context of cases, the five cases provided in State Party’s response do not appear representative of:

- the status and operation of the exclusionary rule in courts; and
- the actual use of audio-visual records by public security organs.

58. Furthermore, HRIC’s sample cases included concerning instances in which medical evidence was used to deny exclusion of evidence on the grounds that no external wounds were apparent.

59. These issues and concerns are discussed in greater detail below.

The Status and Operation of the Exclusionary Rule in Courts

³⁹ See, e.g., the Rules Concerning Questions about Exclusion of Illegal Evidence in Handling Criminal Cases Translation by Chinalawinfo Co., Ltd., Peking University Center for Legal Information.

⁴⁰ See both the Committee’s List of Issues and reports of the State Party, (at Q. 31).

⁴¹ Cases were pulled from the following database: <<http://www.court.gov.cn/wenshu.html>> [accessed October 26, 2015].

60. The establishment of a nationwide online database of court decisions initiated by the Supreme People's Court in 2013 provides useful data to examine aspects of the representative cases described in the State Party's report. A search of this online database for the specific phrase for torture (xingxun bigong) articulated in Article 54, which contains the exclusionary rule, yields close to 6,000 results for the period January 1, 2014 to October 21, 2015. In early 2015, HRIC examined the first 124 search results for cases containing this phrase for torture in the database.

61. In contrast to the representative cases provided by the State Party, in the sample collected by HRIC there were only three cases out of 124 in which a confession or evidence was excluded or withdrawn on the basis that torture had been used.

62. In the HRIC sample, courts rarely discussed the exclusionary rule in detail. Where they did so, courts concluded that torture had not occurred because:

- Investigators' use of interrogation while depriving a detainee of sleep was not unlawful under the Criminal Procedure Law and was not torture.⁴²
- Interrogation records showed that defendants had been asked during interrogation whether they had been tortured and had responded that they had not been.⁴³
- Defendants had failed to provide sufficient evidence proving the place and time (and in some cases, "the manner") that they had been tortured.⁴⁴
- Investigators had produced a "Case Handling Statement" (ban'an shuoming), which showed that torture had not occurred.⁴⁵

63. These examples reveal systemic problems in courts' application of the exclusionary rule, including lack of a legal definition in Chinese law and inappropriate allocation of procedural burdens of proof. The impact of these problems was seen in the cases HRIC examined from its random dataset, including that:

- Courts may at times misunderstand the definition of torture as set forth in Article 1 of the Convention;
- Courts place a high evidentiary burden on defendants who argue for the exclusion of evidence based on torture (i.e. requirements to show place, time and sometimes manner of the torture) and a correspondingly low burden for state organs to deny that it has occurred (i.e. accepting a 'statement' or unspecified 'information' from public security organs or detention centers); and
- Courts are relying upon "statements" by state organs to find that torture has not occurred, despite the conflicts of interest inherent in this evidence.

64. Taken together, the cases demonstrated a clear need for more effective guidelines and judicial training for application of the exclusionary rule in conformity with Article 1 of the Convention.

65. In light of the above, the Committee may wish to ask for additional information and clarifications regarding:

- Guidelines for determining the amount or type of evidence that would be sufficient to rule out torture;
- Guidelines specifically for the interpretation of Article 56's requirement that "[a]n application for exclusion of illegally collected evidence shall include relevant information or materials" (emphasis added);
- Statistics on the use of audio-visual records of proceedings in interrogation rooms; and
- Statistics on cases lodged against law enforcement or other officials as a result of audio-visual recordings and the outcomes of such cases.

Selective Use of Audio-Visual Records in Interrogation

66. In response to the Committee's questions on the use of audio-visual records in interrogation rooms, the State Party further highlights its comprehensive implementation of a system of contemporaneous audio-visual records of interrogations. Specifically, the State Party emphasizes that it has created a uniform requirement for video surveillance in all "areas where cases are handled" (ban'an qu) and that it has carried out renovations to achieve this in the "vast majority of regions," resulting in an "electronic eye" overseeing police conduct (State Party Response, 32).

67. However, audio-visual records of interrogations are not mandatory. Article 121 of the Criminal Procedure Law states:

"[w]hen interrogating a criminal suspect, the investigatory personnel may (keyi) make an audio-visual record of the interrogation process." (emphasis added)

68. Audio-visual records are only required for crimes punishable by life imprisonment, or death, or which are "serious."⁴⁶

⁴⁶ Criminal Procedure Law of The People's Republic of China, translated by Jianfu Chen, in Chen, Jianfu & Ke, Suiwa Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure Law in the People's Republic of China: Commentary and Legislation (2013, Martinus Nijhoff), at 295.

69. This opens the way for audio-visual records to be used selectively, weakening its use as an effective measure to document or prevent torture. For example, in one particularly egregious instance (the case of Z and 4 others versus Xichuan County Public Security Bureau – A Notification of Dismissal of Appeal in Relation to A State Compensation Case (2015))⁴⁷ the audio-visual materials relied upon to find that no torture had occurred were highly misleading. These materials were recorded beginning at the time in which the deceased had already lost consciousness and ended at the point at which he was transferred to the hospital. In another case, the defendant stated that the recording of the interrogation was created after he had been beaten up by police, and yet the court relied upon the recording as part of its reasoning to deny that torture had occurred.⁴⁸

70. As noted above, the cases in HRIC's sample dataset suggest that audio-visual records of interrogations are heavily relied upon by courts to exclude the possibility of torture, often with little more than a cursory reference to their existence or content, followed by a conclusory statement that they negate claims by the defendant that evidence was obtained unlawfully.⁴⁹ Given the centrality of video evidence to judicial discussion of torture claims, its non-mandatory nature, and the concerning reliance on its selective use to deny torture claims, HRIC urges the Committee to request additional information and clarifications regarding:

- Crimes considered “serious” under Chinese law, including the Criminal Procedure Law;
- Definition of “the interrogation process” or the “record of the interrogation” for the purposes of the Criminal Procedure Law; and
- Clarification of the phrase “case handling area” as described in the State Party’s response.⁵⁰

Emphasis on External Injuries in Assessing Medical Evidence

71. Lastly, in its response, the State Party pointed out that, in cases where the exclusionary rule is invoked, either party may proffer the evidence of a medical expert (State Party Response, 31). In HRIC’s sample, courts repeatedly relied upon medical evidence, amongst other things, to dismiss the possibility that torture had been used in obtaining a confession.⁵¹ Court reasoning in these cases regularly invoked the use of “physicals” or physical exams upon entry into/exit from detention centers (rusuo/chusuo tijian), but did not elaborate on how these records disproved torture.⁵² Court judgments among HRIC’s sample that did

⁵² In one case, the court combined physical examination evidence, with selective interrogation records, and selective information from public security to rule out torture:

1. A physical examination record for the defendant at the time of entry into custody at the detention center found no signs of external injury or obvious abnormalities;
2. a particular video of the interrogation process and information provided by public security investigators make it clear that during the process of interrogating defendant no torture was engaged in provide a more detailed discussion included troubling statements relying on external physical injury as a key indicator that torture had occurred. For example:

- In one case, a “Statement of Work” produced by the public security organs and a “Detainee Health Record” showing “no external injuries” were sufficient to prove no torture had occurred.⁵³
- In another case, in which defendants alleged torture, an absence of “external physical injuries” in detainee health records made during entry and exit from the detention center were sufficient.⁵⁴

72. The emphasis on an absence of “external physical injuries” raises concerns that judges may not be properly trained in understanding the full scope of activities which constitute torture under the Convention. Medical checks may also not be sufficiently detailed or may for other reasons fail to capture forms of torture that occur by means other than through direct physical injuries (e.g., use of implements such as phone books to inflict internal physical harm without external manifestations and the use of psychological abuse to extract information).

73. In light of the issues revealed in these sample cases, the Committee may wish to ask for additional information and clarifications regarding:

- Measures or steps taken to ensure judicial training and follow-up to training sessions to facilitate understanding and identification of the various activities which constitute torture under the Convention; and
- Guidelines regarding the use of medical evidence in exclusion cases, including any guidelines for how health checks of persons exiting and entering detention should be conducted.

CONCLUSION

74. The Committee’s review of China’s implementation of its obligations under the Convention comes at an important time of both broadening police power and expanding laws and policies related to the criminal justice system. With rights defenders and lawyers under intensified repression, improving the independent monitoring of detainees, access to information regarding the criminal justice process, and access to justice when torture occurs is more important than ever. HRIC looks forward to a rigorous and constructive review.
